Corn announces resignation to run for Student Council

OKLAHOMA CITY (OP) – Sen. Kenneth Corn, D-Poteau, announced his resignation Wednesday in order to pursue a vacant seat in his high school's student council.

"I feel that my experience in state government has given me the skills necessary to accomplish meaningful change for the students of Howe High School."

Sen. Kenneth Corn, D-Poteau

Corn said that, if elected, he would work on getting a Coke machine in the senior cafeteria and maybe moving the prom to an off-campus location.

Commission recommends creation of at least three more Ogle brothers

OKLAHOMA CITY (OP) – Seeking to boost the state's supply of tall, square-jawed, slightly condescending newscasters, a bipartisan panel has recommended the immediate creation of three more Ogle brothers.

"Kelly, Kent and Ken are doing an admirable job, but Ogles are the Baldwins of the heartland, and we feel that a strong Ogle presence is required to foster economic development, especially in the rural areas."

In its six-month study, the commission found that large areas of southeastern Oklahoma, as well as the Panhandle region, lack basic Ogle amenities such as Kelly's two cents or Kent's puppy-dog eyes.

Some expressed concern about the report. While most agreed that more Ogles were necessary, some suggested that a shortage of "K" names should limit the number of newscasters created.

"I mean, we're already stretching it," said one official. "Kelly isn't even a guy's name. I guess we could call one 'Kris' but what's next? Kliff? Kasey? Come on people."

The panel says it is already considering the K problems, and has recommended Kajagoo-goo, K-Swiss, and Kettle. Future Ogles will be assigned the letter K followed by a number.

In the wake of the report, the Ogle clonging facility near Vinita has geared up for a new batch.

Cargill proved correct as homosexuals destroy families, seize control of state

OKLAHOMA CITY (OP) – Long criticized for his opposition to gay rights, Rep. Lance Cargill, R-Harrah, was vindicated yesterday as homosexuals seized control of Oklahoma.

"I told you that homosexuals wouldn't rest until they had come into our homes and destroyed the values on which Oklahoma was built. Nobody listened to me, and now look at this," Cargill said from his dungeon in the House basement.

"During my term, I have consistently set aside Oklahoma's high rates of obesity, tobacco use and teen pregnancy, realizing that homosexuals are the single greatest threat facing Oklahoma," Cargill said. "I knew that eternal discrimination is the price of freedom."

While other legislators focused on reforming workers compensation or extending Medicaid, Cargill filed resolutions condemning the U.S. Supreme Court for striking down state anti-sodomy laws.

Oklahoma's new homosexual leaders said their first order of business would be indoctrinating children to the gay agenda and breaking up traditional families.

A rainbow flag flies over the state Capitol following its conquest by homosexuals. Gay leaders said that Oklahoma's lack of an amendment banning gay marriage left it defenseless against attack

Lawmakers can't discuss size of OU's endowment with a straight face

OKLAHOMA CITY (OP) – A bill that would require university officials to notify legislators of tuition increases was delayed last week as Senate debate turned to the size of OU's endowment.

During a presentation by OU president David Boren, the issue of endowment was raised.

"Would you say that the university is 'well-endowed'?" asked Sen. Owen Laughlin, R-Woodward.

"Certainly, there's no question that OU's endowment is huge, and growing at a rapid rate," Boren replied.

"Heh heh, he said 'endowed'" noted Sen. Sam Helton, D-Lawton.

For the next thirty minutes, Senators argued as to whether OU was more well-endowed than OSU.

Sen. Angela Monson, D-Oklahoma City, rolled her eyes through the debate, unsure as to why her male counterparts were so amused by OU's sizable funding.

"I haven't seen them giggle this much since we debated cockfighting," she said.
